Letter of Recommendation

"When you teach a woman a skill, you give her the power to change her life."

It is with immense pride and gratitude that I write this letter of recommendation for Mehak Dhawan, a Grade 11 student at Jumeirah College, Dubai, who joined us at The Creative Thinkers Forum (TCTF) during her 2025 summer break in India with an intention to share her knowledge. What was meant to be a family trip to her grandmother's home in India became, in her own words, "a summer I will always remember." And we describe it as the most enriching and heartwarming experience, where she not only upskilled but touched many lives.

Mehak came to us with a lot of enthusiasm and a clear, well thought out idea. She wanted to design and lead a technology bootcamp for young women as part of our digital literacy program. Where we had long been teaching these women the basics of computer literacy, she envisioned going further and equipping them with practical, market-ready skills in technology, design, and media that could economically empower them. Her conviction was strong, and we immediately knew it was the right step forward.

What impressed us most was her ethos. She'd made sure to establish her credibility in LCNC website expertise having completed 2 certified Master courses and a 2-week training with 'Jigsaw', a startup brand strategist. She was not someone who simply wanted to "volunteer" — she took charge of defining what her time with us would look like, setting weekly targets and proactively directing our supporting team, chanting the transformative power of technology.

From July 15-August 15, Mehak executed 'Code for Change', leading 8 workshops over 4 weeks, with a cohort of 15 young women from economically disadvantaged strata. Her well-designed, standardized curriculum included AI prompt engineering training and website development on Wix and Scratch. She handheld the girls in creating profiles on freelancing platforms like GitHub and Fiverr.

By the second week, the girls had stopped calling her 'Ma'am' and started calling her 'didi' (sister): a bond she wore like a badge of honor. Over the course of these eight workshops, we saw the confidence of fifteen young women skyrocket. In the feedback, attendees applauded that she took the time to sit with each participant, often working one-on-one, explaining patiently why a prompt wasn't working or how to polish a portfolio. She laughed with them when mistakes happened and clapped loudly at small victories.

At the end of the program, Mehak organized a portfolio pitch competition in collaboration with Jigsaw. The result was beyond what we imagined: three women were offered paid internships with Jigsaw, while the rest left with profiles ready to apply for freelance opportunities.

For us at TCTF, we have faith that Mehak's undertaking is a reminder of how much a person can achieve with empathy, preparation, and determination. We are proud of all she has achieved here. I wholeheartedly recommend her for any opportunity she pursues, knowing that she will bring the same commitment and compassion that she brought to us.For The Creative Thinkers Forum (TCTF)
